LEONARD WOOLF

After the Deluge: A Study of Communal Psychology. Vol. II

THIS is the second volume of a work intended to be a detailed study of the whole of contemporary political and social psychology. It is an attempt to investigate the relation between our individual and communal beliefs and desires on the one hand and contemporary events and civilization on the other. The first volume was mainly concerned with democracy and democratic psychology in general as they developed in the eighteenth century and the American and French Revolutions. Volume II deals with their further development in England and France, in the Reform crisis and the revolution of 1830. It traces the beginnings of that contradiction in middle-class democracy and the failure to solve the problem of political and economic democracy which have had such disastrous effects upon our own times.

SOME PRESS NOTICES OF VOL. I

"A remarkable beginning to what promises to be a book of the first importance. . . . Few recent works of this magnitude have combined so many attractive qualities. He writes with a crystal clarity. His reading is wide, his illustrations singularly happy; and he has what is very nearly genius for the apposite quotation."

HAROLD J. LASKI in The New Statesman

"It is an important book, and should be studied, not only by those who are academically interested in social psychology, but by all those who care a fig for humanity."

The Spectator

"I have no hesitation in saying that this is the most valuable piece of work in the field of communal psychology that has appeared since Graham Wallas published his Human Nature in Politics more than twenty years ago."

HERBERT ROSINSKI

The German Army

THERE are few subjects which are of more absorbing interest at the moment than the ideas and personalities which are shaping the policy of Germany's great military machine. This comprehensive and penetrating study, which includes a lucid sketch of the development of ancient Prussia's army stage by stage into the Reichswehr of today is by an acknowledged expert on the subject, now a refugee in this country, where he has already made a name for himself writing in the leading periodicals under the pseudonym of "Miles." The book stands in a class by itself, as one of the most ambitious analyses ever attempted of a modern nation's army.

C. F. FRASER

Control of Aliens in the British Commonwealth of Nations

A COMPACT study of one of to-day's most critical problems, viz. the migration of refugees from Europe into the various self-governing units of the British Commonwealth. Mr. Fraser has set forth in clear and not too technical language the nature of the obstacles to be surmounted by the prospective immigrant. He has also analysed the alien's position as to his public rights and duties in the United Kingdom and the overseas Dominions. In short, one may readily find the law applicable from the moment the alien seeks to enter British realms until he attains the status of a naturalized citizen or subject. The author has had the advantage of personal contact with officials of the Home Office as well as with some of the corresponding departments in the Dominions. The book is one which should be of equal interest to the resident alien, the prospective immigrant, and the government official. An effort has been made not only to indicate the law and procedure, but to determine the policies which underlie such legislation throughout the British Commonwealth of Nations.

General Literature

New Writing:

New Series No. 3
Christmas, 1939

New Writing, for which the Hogarth Press announces a specially enlarged Christmas number, has a unique place in modern literature, and has been called "The Yellow Book of the 'Thirties." It is bound in cloth, and has all the permanence of a book, and in the new series, which was inaugurated last autumn, specially written articles for each number, with photographic illustrations, were introduced to enlarge its scope and significance. Up till now it has appeared as a periodical every six months, but with this number, that chapter in its existence is closed. In the future, it may appear at irregular intervals, or may be transformed into something which will make it more accessible and more comprehensive still; an announcement will be made in due course. Meanwhile, the critics seem to be as enthusiastic as ever. Professor B. I. Evans, recommending No. 2 in The Manchester Guardian, wrote: "It is no longer necessary to praise New Writing. Mr. John Lehmann's collection of verse and prose by English and foreign writers is now an established institution. . . . New Writing has come to offer something not found elsewhere among English literary publications." The Autumn number of New Writing will have one of the most distinguished lists of contributors New Writing has yet produced, and will include: W. H. Auden, B. L. Coombes, David Gascoyne, Willy Goldman, Louis MacNeice, William Plomer, George Orwell, V. S. Pritchett, Stephen Spender, Rex Warner, Basil Wright, and many others.

Fiction

HENRY GREEN

Party Going

MR. HENRY GREEN, in Party Going, has turned to the life of the idle rich, a far cry from the life of artisans in an industrial town described in his last work, Living, which was published ten years ago, and to which attention was called by Mr. Isherwood and Mr. Cyril Connolly in recent books when speaking of the contemporary novel. Party Going deals with some young people who are going on a holiday. Fog delays them at the station, and, when their train leaves four hours later, the book ends. Three of them are in love or think they are. The result is entertaining and something more.

Educational

L. B. PEKIN

Coeducation

IN this book a critic of orthodox upper-class education (Public Schools: their Failure and their Reform) and an advocate of much—though not all—that is associated with the “modern” school (Progressive Schools: their Principles and Practice) discusses the shared upbringing of the sexes. He follows the educational theory of coeducation from Plato to the present day, and traces the roots of modern coeducation in women’s emancipation and the New School movement. But the book is far from being merely a theoretical study: the author, whose experience of the old and new ways of education has touched Wellington College at one pole and St. Christopher, Letchworth, at the other, considers very fully and candidly all the practical points that parents and segregational teachers will want to see discussed, and with which seven years’ intimate contact with every aspect of the subject at a whole-hearted coeducational boarding-school has familiarized him.

Poetry

Poets of Tomorrow

First Selection

Containing poems by R. P. HEWETT, H. B. MALLALIEU, RUTHVEN TODD and ROBERT WALLER

IT has for long been recognized that the young poet setting out on his career today encounters unfair difficulty in publishing and persuading the public to pay attention to his work, with the result that a number of promising poets are discouraged from writing early on, and our literature is the poorer. The Hogarth Press now proposes to attempt to solve their difficulties in some measure, by the publication of volumes from time to time containing a selection of work by young poets which has not yet appeared in book form. Each volume will represent not less than three and not more than seven poets, with a more substantial range of poems than the ordinary anthology with its thirty or fifty contributors can give. The poets included in this first volume will not be unknown to readers who have followed New Writing, New Verse and Twentieth Century Verse.

Poetry

JOAN ADENEY EASDALE

Amber Innocent

EIGHT years ago, the Hogarth Press published Joan Easdale's first book of poems, now out of print. Its title was A Collection of Poems, and its sub-title recorded the fact that it had been written between the ages of 14 and 17. Many people agreed with the view of the publishers that these poems were a remarkable achievement in view of the author's age, but that they were also something more; they were not merely the work of an infant prodigy; they were not and could not be great poetry, but they had a streak in them of real and individual poetry. The author's second volume, published in 1932, Clemence and Clare, confirmed this view, though it was still obviously an "early work." Joan Easdale's third book which is now published is a long poem; she began it in 1932 and finished it—after considerable pauses—in 1939. The impulse to write it came from a dream, but, as the author herself says, the poem "springs only from what I have observed in everyday life and relationships, and things I cannot remember."

VIRGINIA WOOLF

Reviewing

With a Note by LEONARD WOOLF

IN this pamphlet Mrs. Woolf deals with the present position of reviewing and the reviewer and their relation to criticism and the critic. She gives reasons for believing that the original functions of the reviewer can no longer be adequately performed in the modern press and she makes an interesting suggestion for abolishing him and dividing his functions between two entirely separate kinds of practitioner. Mr. Woolf has written a note to the pamphlet which attempts to put forward a rather different view of the problem.

Moses and Monotheism

8s. 6d.

WITHIN a few days of publication Moses and Monotheism took its place not only as one of the most discussed books of the year but also as the contribution of genius to the philosophy of religion.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS:

The Times Literary Supplement: "One of the greatest original thinkers of our times . . . his book contains the meditations of one of the most distinguished of living Jews on the destiny and significance of his race at a crucial moment in its history . . . the book is impressive. In a sense it is beyond criticism . . . it bears the marks of genius."

The Times: "His pregnant and original book . . . a book which scrutinizes, with the lucid candour of genius, the religious evolution of man. . . . Those who have the patience to penetrate beyond the word to the thing and enter into the majesty of Freud's conception . . . may find that a truly religious susceptibility is rather enriched than offended by Freud's simple and tremendous effort at synthesis."

The News Chronicle: "Of importance to all who believe in God . . . the latest and perhaps the last of the theories that will send his name down to history among those of the great scientific pioneers."

"FROM her family history, Miss Sackville-West has extracted a tale in which brilliance of colour and picturesqueness of detail out-Balzacs Balzac. The story is almost incredible. We have a British diplomatist living openly with a Spanish dancer during the zenith of Victorian prudery, inducing German royalties to sponsor his natural children at the font, and, when appointed Ambassador at Washington, making one of these children his hostess at the Embassy. This girl marries her cousin, the heir to her father's peerage, and assists him to prove that her parents were never married . . . she has brought to the reader nothing but pleasure by providing the subject for this fascinating book."

CHRISTOPHER ISHERWOOD

Goodbye to Berlin

"His characters are alive in all they say and do. . . . The story of Sally Bowles . . . to my mind is a little masterpiece ranking, if not in the world of Tchekhov, at least in that of Katherine Mansfield. It is one of Mr. Isherwood's virtues that one cannot have enough of his people: I could go on reading volume after volume about Mr. Norris and Sally."
